What Is Narration?

Narration is the way a story is told. When you read a book, you're hearing the story from someone's perspective — that's the narrator. The narrator is the voice telling you what happens. Choosing whether to use first person or third person narration completely changes how readers experience the story.

First Person Narration

First person narration uses the pronouns 'I' and 'we'. The narrator is a character in the story telling it themselves. You see events exactly as that character sees them, feel what they feel, and know only what they know.

For example: "I woke up late. I grabbed my bag and ran to school." This makes the story feel personal and immediate. You're inside the character's head.

Think of it like having a friend call you and describe what happened to them that day. You only hear their side of the story, their feelings, their thoughts — nothing more.

Third Person Narration

Third person narration uses pronouns like 'he', 'she', 'it', and 'they'. The narrator is not a character in the story — they're an outside observer telling you about other people's lives.

For example: "She woke up late. She grabbed her bag and ran to school." This creates distance between you and the characters. You can know things the character doesn't know.

Think of it like watching a film. You see what happens from the outside, and the camera can show you things happening in different places at the same time.

Why Does It Matter?

Authors choose first person when they want readers to feel close to a character and experience their confusion, secrets, and emotions directly. Books like The Diary of a Young Girl by Anne Frank use this powerfully.

Authors choose third person when they want readers to see the bigger picture — multiple characters, hidden secrets, and the truth about situations that confused characters don't understand yet. Most adventure and fantasy novels use this.

Neither is better — they just create different experiences. Understanding the difference helps you appreciate why an author made their choice and how it affects your feelings as you read.
