What is sin?

Sin is a religious word that means doing something wrong or breaking God's rules. But different religions understand sin in different ways. In Christianity, sin is when people disobey God and act against what is good and right. In Islam, sin (called dhanb) is an action that goes against the teachings of Allah. In Judaism, sin means failing to follow God's laws and the teachings in the Torah. In Buddhism, there is less focus on sin and more on karma—the idea that every action has consequences.

Think of it like breaking a promise to a friend. When you promise to meet them and then don't show up, you've broken their trust. Sin is similar—it's breaking your promise or relationship with God.

How do religions view forgiveness?

Most religions teach that forgiveness is possible, but the paths to forgiveness differ. In Christianity, believers can confess their sins to God and ask for forgiveness through Jesus Christ. Many Christians believe that Jesus died to take away human sin, so forgiveness comes through faith and repentance. In Catholicism, there's a special practice called confession, where people speak to a priest about their sins.

In Islam, Muslims can seek forgiveness directly from Allah through repentance (called tawbah). They must feel genuine regret and promise not to repeat the sin. Ramadan, the month of fasting, is an important time for seeking forgiveness. In Judaism, Yom Kippur—the Day of Atonement—is the holiest day of the year, when Jews fast and ask God for forgiveness.

Think of it like when you accidentally hurt a friend's feelings. First you feel bad about it, then you say sorry and mean it, and finally they forgive you and you move forward. That's what repentance and forgiveness are like.

Why does forgiveness matter?

Forgiveness is central to most religions because it allows people to make peace with God and with themselves. It teaches that even when people do wrong, they can change and improve. Forgiveness isn't about ignoring wrongdoing—it's about acknowledging mistakes, feeling sorry, and trying to become a better person. Religious teachings on forgiveness also encourage people to forgive others, not just seek forgiveness themselves. This creates communities built on compassion, understanding, and second chances.
